Lina Filipovich explores feminist reappropriation of religious and political symbols, transforming them into rituals that challenge patriarchal authority, memory, and cultural power. Working across stained glass, textiles, sound, installation, and performance, her practice engages ritual as both a personal and collective experience.

Through electroacoustic compositions, tactile installations, and quasi-ritualistic performances, she creates immersive environments that invite contemplation, participation, and critical reflection.

Techniques historically associated with women's and queer craft traditions, such as patchwork, bright fabrics, and reclaimed materials, become forms of aesthetic disobedience and cultural affirmation. Her work is deeply informed by questions of historical memory and political symbolism: rather than erasing these symbols, she reactivates them to transform their inherited meanings, confronting the persistence of ideological power and exploring how art can function as a protective and transformative ritual.

Her installations challenge dominant narratives while imagining new forms of collective consciousness and resistance.

In the Decameron, Boccaccio adopts an ambiguous approach to religion: he portrays a fourteenth-century Florence governed by Christian morality, while criticizing a corrupt clergy and a religion powerless in the face of the plague. The novellas also reveal the violence inherent in the patriarchal and heteronormative structures of Catholicism.

In her work, Lina Filipovich offers an equally complex reading of religious motifs, which she seeks not to erase but to reinvent through a critical lens, overturning the power relations embedded in narrative and iconography to give rise to aesthetic forms of disobedience.

Drawing on this ancient art form, she conceptually and physically dismantles and displaces its subjects and forms: iconography drawn from medieval manuscripts and fifteenth-century frescoes becomes abstract through the artist's intervention, while the very structure of stained glass is reimagined as a contemporary architecture of raw steel and LED lighting.

With this work, she revisits the motif of the iconostasis — a screen of icons traditionally separating the sanctuary from the congregation in Orthodox churches — interpreting this stained-glass structure not as a barrier between the sacred and the profane, but as a porous membrane between the visibility and dissolution of images.

A silhouette, perhaps that of a saint or a Madonna, disappears and merges into the colored glass of the stained-glass work that Lina Filipovich presents directly on the floor at the Arsenal. [...]

In certain parts of her work, the artist has even abandoned figuration altogether, in an iconoclastic gesture. It is then the play of light on the glass, its reflections and projections, that captures the viewer's attention, particularly here, where the gold covering the decorative elements further enhances the luminosity of the work.

Fallen Star is a performance created during my residency in Budapest, with the support of the Institut français in Hungary and Budapest Gallery.

During the performance, I activate monuments in Memento Park, a site filled with propaganda statues from the socialist era. I transform the place into an esoteric zone, where the statues appear as relics of a fallen power, charged with residual energy.

The performance takes the form of a ritual of disobedience, using simple objects: candles, ribbons and red fabrics. Facing these figures of masculine authority, I perform quasi-liturgical gestures: touching the statues, encircling them with ribbons, lighting candles at their feet. I create an inverted star with red ribbon, transforming a sign of domination into a symbol of feminine and spiritual reappropriation, a gesture of contemporary witchcraft. The star becomes a portal between past and present, politics and magic.

Produced in collaboration with IRCAM, So Blue is a mockumentary about an imaginary journey made by Elvis Presley to Minsk in the 1960s.

The work is built around an original song created through a technique of sound collage, which forms its core. It reconstructs a fictional “lost Elvis song” from fragments of his existing recordings, transformed through changes in pitch, tempo and harmony. The lyrics follow the same principle of montage, assembling archetypal words and phrases drawn from the language of 1960s pop music. The accompanying video combines excerpts from Marlen Khutsiev’s Soviet film I Am Twenty with documentary footage of Minsk.

Blending the political with the intimate, So Blue explores the construction of historical narratives and the credibility of images and sound. By merging fiction and documentary, it blurs the boundaries between truth and fabrication, proposing a narrative in which imagination becomes part of collective memory and questions our relationship to history and fiction.

SOUND WORKS

Magnificat is a project that combines recordings of Sergei Rachmaninoff's All-Night Vigil with electronic sequences.

The work explores the ritual dimension of sound through references to industrial music, esoteric sonic practices, and experiments with magnetic tape.

Through processes of layering, fragmentation and transformation, the choral textures are destabilized and become a shifting sonic material.

BFHC explores the deconstruction and reappropriation of classical music through sampling, recycling and the reassembly of existing compositions.

The project takes as its starting point works by Baroque composers — J. S. Bach, G. F. Handel, G. Frescobaldi, N. Carleton and F. Couperin — transformed into sonic material through processes of cutting, slowing down, looping and fragmentation.

Flowers of Evil II unfolds as a personal sonic ritual, moving between fragmented techno, dark ambient textures and dub psychedelia. The album explores repetition and subtle variation as processes of transformation, where duration itself becomes a ritual of listening.

Conceived as a “sequel,” the project enters into dialogue with the pioneering electronic experiments of Ruth White and Suzanne Ciani, reactivating them through a different temporal and symbolic perspective.

The work extends the artist’s wider visual practice, particularly textile works activated by sound and presented alongside the album at the Salon de Montrouge. It develops a personal mythology in which figures of revolt, emancipation and knowledge are reimagined within a post-religious imaginary.
